Career development facilitator training program offered

Beginning winter 2002 semester, Oakland University's School of Education and Human Services (SEHS) will offer a Career Development Facilitator (CDF) Training Program at their Macomb Intermediate School District location. The deadline to register is Friday, Dec. 14.

CDF training is an extensive certification program designed for individuals who are employed as career resource center coordinators, school counselors, employment and placement specialists, human resource professionals, and educators.

The program is taught nationally and internationally. CDF training is endorsed by the National Career Development Association, the National Employment Counseling Association and the National Association of Workforce Development Professionals.

Some areas to be addressed during the 120-hour program include career and labor market information, career planning, assessment approaches, technology and career development, client training, meeting the needs of diverse populations, and ethical and legal issues.

Participants have the option to take the course for six university undergraduate or graduate credits. Those who successfully complete the course are eligible for national certification.

The cost of the program is $685 and includes extensive resource material.

Additional information about the program and earning university credit is available on the Department of Professional Development and Education Outreach Web site or by contacting the Professional Development staff at (586) 226-8462 or pro-development@oakland.edu.
