FROM THE SCHOOL OF EDUCATION AND HUMAN SERVICES

A Bit of History from Chair of Reading and Language Arts Jim Cipielewski: Reading and Language Arts has showcased a unique course, Authors and Illustrators' Art and Craft (RDG 570) for decades. The department has provided a quality children's literature program since the 1960's and the arrival of Jane Bingham who, with her colleagues, presented courses ranging from literature for the young child to young adult literature as well as storytelling. At the same time, Harry Hahn, the founding member of Reading and Language Arts, was arranging for summer courses featuring noted scholars and speakers such as Bill Martin, Jr. Some of us still remember people standing in the hallway outside the Gold Rooms to catch a part of his presentations. This continued with the able assistance of Gerry Palmer Coon bringing in noted speakers from the U.S., Canada and Great Britain. In 1983, Jane Bingham organized a conference at Meadowbrook Hall with speakers such as Brian Wildsmith, a winner of the Kate Greenaway Medal in Britain; Nancy Bone, a Newbery Honor Winner; and Robert Cormier, author of The Chocolate War. The moderator of the three-day event was Leland Jacobs, himself a poet, scholar, and enthusiastic promoter of reading and children's literature. The three-day conference was tied to the RDG 570 course that summer.

A few years later, Dorsey Hammond and Gerry Palmer Coon were asked to organize a summer RDG 570 course, which would center on authors and illustrators. They rose to the occasion and featured outstanding authors and illustrators including such noted guest lecturers as Mitch Albom, Robert SanSouci, Patricia Polacco, and, a new author, Christopher Paul Curtis, who was just releasing his first book, The Watsons Go to Birmingham, 1963. That book went on to win a Newbery Honor and the Coretta Scott King Award. He has since won the Newbery Medal and the Coretta Scott King Medal for Bud Not Buddy, the first and only author to achieve this distinction. Gerry and Dorsey certainly had great insights.

In 1997, Linda Pavonetti, who had just joined the SEHS, and Jim Cipielewski were asked to take over the course beginning in the summer of 1998. From the beginning it was clear that Linda had the necessary savvy to arrange top-ranked illustrators and authors. That first year Paul Zelinsky, the 1998 winner of the Caldecott Medal for his Rapunzel; Joan Lowry Nixon, who had four Edgar Allen Poe awards for her mysteries; and Denise Fleming, a winner of a Caldecott Honor award, shared their artistic processes with the OU students in the course. The guest authors and illustrators helped students understand more about the creation of wonderful children's books by showing them storyboards, multiple drafts (Tom Barron shared his more than 12 complete rewrites of one his early books!), writers' notebooks, artists' sketchbooks, suitcases full of rejection letters, and all manner of information that they experience.

Brian Selznick gave the students a rare and wonderful insight into his world. Two years before The Invention of Hugo Cabret hit the bookstores, Brian shared excerpts from the book and series of illustrations he had created for the book. The incomparable design of the book, incorporating multiple pages of illustrations that carried the story as well as exemplary text was stunning. It was more illuminating as the students glimpsed Brian's creative process while the book was still embryonic. The fact that the book was published two years later in a new format was special; Hugo Cabret winning the Caldecott medal as the most distinguished illustrated book for children gave those students a sense of having been "on the inside" of the creation and publication of a classic.

Reading and Language Arts hopes and expects that students in the Authors and Illustrators' Art and Craft course take this insight and excitement about authors, illustrators, and their books back to their classrooms and inoculate (in a positive sense) their students and fellow educators with the same enthusiasm. We'll continue to work diligently toward this end.
