*"Not everyone

learn the same things" — Billie Demont*

B.G.S. Degree Attracts New "Breed" Student

When O.U. student Gordon Bove signed on as a Pontiac policeman, he dropped his plans for an education degree.

"Student teaching was out of the question," recalls the 25-year-old Waterford man whose job means monthly shift changes. So he tackled a new major — and with it more course requirements.

"I began to feel like a professional student," explains Bove, who originally planned to graduate from Oakland with his wife Jan (Heitjan) in 1972.

For Bove, the light at the end of the academic tunnel is O.U.'s new Bachelor of General Studies Degree. Designed for part-time students — mainly those with associate degrees and fulltime jobs — BGS lets them build their own course programs.

"It lets you study what you can to round out your daily needs," feels Bove, who hopes to graduate this spring and go on to a masters degree in police administration.

"I can skip around and get the courses I want, need and can use in my job."

The BGS degree is offered through O.U.'s new Center for General and Career Studies, which includes Evening and Extension programs as well as Learning Skills and New Charter College.

BGS requires only writing proficiency and 124 semester credits — 32 in 300 and 400 level courses. Transfer students with associate degrees may apply 62 junior college credits to the requirement.

Part of a national trend toward evening and weekend colleges to attract a more "mature" college student, it allows students to bill their own degree program. But is BGS a "watered down" degree or more "creative" approach to learning?

When the BGS was debated last spring, some O.U. faculty members feared it might lead to special courses and faculty — a "second rate" degree.

Others embraced the program, hoping its flexible approach would allow their departments to tighten requirements.

One argument against the plan was that BGS wouldn't prepare students for a specific line of work, handicapping them in the tight job market.

Billie Demont, Associate Provost and Director of the Center for General and Career Studies, feels the program is simply "student accountability."

"Not everyone wants to learn the same things. This program is terrifically flexible. The student has maximum decision making power over his degree."

Associate Provost Demont, who has headed O.U.'s Spring and Summer sessions and Evening Program, is quick to point out that she is aiming not at the typical O.U. undergrad — but a "whole different breed of student."

These are older students, mainly part-timers and many already employed — looking not toward finding a job but for job "enlargement."

"They are already employed, perhaps own businesses and make more money than some professors," she explained. "They're not looking for the B.A., the 'Big Break' but to improving communication skills, reading, writing and persuasive abilities."

"They're interested in learning as a lifestyle; learning for its own sake."

Exercise Stress Tests Lead to Cardiac Program

By BRENDA CASON
"In Touch" Special Writer

Its "exercise stress testing" program, which measures human capacity for work, may result in Oakland becoming the only educational institution in Michigan to offer cardiac rehabilitation to heart patients.

O.U. Physical Education Assistant Professor Fred Stransky, who brought the program here two years ago, administers tests in an exercise physiology lab set up in the Sports and Recreation Building. According to Stransky, his equipment is the most sophisticated available anywhere in the nation.

The tests measure the functional working capacity of the two major systems of the human body — cardiovascular and respiratory.

Test results provide information on susceptibility of the subject to cardiovascular diseases and a basis for prescriptive exercise. According to Stransky, everyone should exercise to some degree. These tests help determine what sort of exercise program the subject should undertake.

He prescribes some "continuous" activity — ranging from cycling and jogging to running and jumping rope.

"It's been proven that inactivity is directly related to cardio-vascular diseases," explained Stransky, whose PhD from Florida State is in Movement Sciences.

The lab is equipped to measure an electrocardiogram (ECG) by having the subject peddle a bicycle while leads attached to his chest measure his work with respect to his cardiovascular system. The ECG is then interpreted by Dr. Murray Levin, Pontiac General Hospital.

Most important is the piece of equipment which measures oxygen intake (the ability to extract oxygen from the air). This is the test which actually measures the functional working capacity of the cardiovascular system.

"The amount of work a person is able to do increases with his increased ability to extract oxygen from the air," Stransky said.

Other equipment also measures lung volumes, analyzes blood for blood fat and analyzes body composition to determine obesity.

Though stress testing is done throughout the nation, Oakland is one of very few universities involved in this program. Stransky believes only Central Michigan University is doing similar work in Michigan.

Since the program started here, Stransky has become interested in developing a cardiac rehabilitation program for heart patients. When it gets underway in the near future, O.U. will be the only state educational institution to offer such a service, he said.

"A number of programs have shown people can be rehabilitated through exercise."

"There are no programs in Michigan for people who have had heart attacks. I've had several people call me and say they have had heart attacks and want to know if there is anyplace they can go to get an exercise plan. They don't want to just lie down and become invalids," he said.

The exercise physiology lab is already equipped for such a program. But there are organizational problems to iron out.

"It's a matter of organizing and affiliating with the hospitals. We don't yet have the medical expertise. We need the clinician. Hopefully we'll be working those details out shortly."

B.G.S.

The Center is working with community colleges and labor unions to attract residents who would like to add onto associate degrees in Labor Studies, Business Administration and Applied Science Technology.

But Demont is frank in acknowledging that student accountability isn't the only basis for the new program, which now has 24 students but hopes for 200 to 300 by fall.

"There's no question that it's an economic advantage to the University. We can expand our market without increasing our investment."

She emphasized that the program will aim at new students — not attract from other O.U. degree programs. And courses will be university wide, not just designed for BGS students.

O.U. grad Kevin Kenney (74), Associate Director of the Center, said BGS students are "serious" about learning.

"One of the first questions we get is whether this is an easier degree. Our students aren't looking for an easy out. They value that money they're putting toward a degree."

One drawback to the BGS — which Demont cautions students about — is there are no guarantees that it will get them into grad school or on a job.

"If a student wants to get a masters degree we advise them its risky to take the BGS. They need structure and should stick with a department," said Demont.

"But I think we're moving toward job placement that deals with individual competency rather than credentials. Students aren't guaranteed a teaching or management job coming out of department programs either."

She said she has been "thrilled" at faculty cooperation. "I didn't expect to move as quickly as we have. A lot of faculty members see this as an opportunity for them — not only in the classroom but being involved in new programs."

One O.U. student who is enthusiastic about BGS is Wanda Panduren of Oxford. At 50, Mrs. Panduren has been a deputy register at Oakland County Probate Court 27 years. She came to O.U. two years ago to "study things of interest" to her — and maybe someday go to law school ("If I live long enough," she chuckles.)

"I don't need a job," explains Mrs. Panduren, who will be eligible for county retirement in five years. In her two years the former Oxford High salutatorian has taken all kinds of night courses — from philosophy, Slavic area studies to Introduction to Acting.

"I've taken a lot of different things and really enjoyed it. To me, it's the best of all worlds."

Mike Mansour (69,71): Teaching Urban Ecology

This is Mike Mansour's month.

Though busy year round as Environmental Education Coordinator for Pontiac Schools, the O.U. grad (69, 71) really swings into action during April.

"Spring is the season for my job," explains 33-year-old Mansour, who teaches urban kids how to plant trees, camp, garden and clean up their neighborhoods.

"I wish school ran through July — there's so much work to do."

Mansour, with BA and MA degrees in elementary education from Oakland, taught grade school in Pontiac for three years before starting the Environmental Education Program in 1971.

"I was involved in the first Earth Day in Pontiac and just sort of grew with the awareness myself — the 'Earth Ethic.'"

Pontiac is one of only a handful of Michigan districts providing Environmental Education. Its funding — through the federal Title 1 program for upgrading reading and math skills of socio-economically disadvantaged children — is even more unusual.

"We feel we can get kids to read and do math through their high interest in the environment — natural things," explains Mansour. Because urban Pontiac "deals often with failure" he foregoes traditional teaching for outreach type projects with jazzy names.

"I fancy advertising," admits the educator. "But I've got to get my foot in the door with the teachers."

For their first project "The Big Ripoff," Pontiac students tore 5,000 political posters off city buildings after the election in Nov. 1972. During Arbor Week and "The Shady Deal" they plant thousands of pine seedlings. Each spring they count city dogs and collect old phone books.

"There are more complaints in Pontiac about dogs than anything else," said Mansour, whose young family lives in the city and is committed to it.

"These are urban environmental problems and fun."

Based out of a recycled white frame house, Mansour is now working on GASP (the American Cancer Society's anti-smoking effort) and bracing himself for a full school camping season.

While only three Pontiac schools were camping in 1971, 14 will go this spring.

"Outdoor education is not really environmental education but it's part of the growth process. If a teacher wants me to set up an aquarium by God I'll set up an aquarium!"

With the help of wife Carol (Brownell 66), a former elementary school teacher whose "fantastic ability to make things grow" awes her husband, Mansour will continue a community garden program he started last year. He also hopes to develop "creative playgrounds" out of telephone poles, tires, ropes, plywood and old trees.

While he'd like to see other districts try their hand at Environmental Education, Mansour says the program is a big expense ("at least $40,000 a year to run.")

"And most peoples' environmental perception is so narrow — they see it as trees. But it's things like land use management, solid waste control, food and population."

"Building the Pontiac Stadium was a tremendous environmental activity. I love football and think the stadium is a beautiful thing. But it takes tremendous energy and has changed the whole lifestyle of that neighborhood."

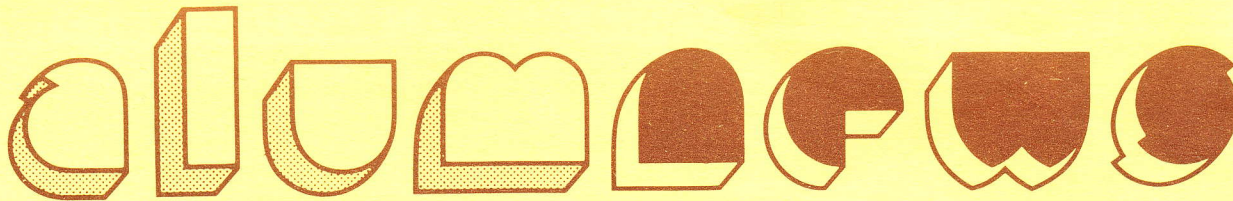

"And here in Pontiac we're burying the Clinton River — that's disgraceful."

"Education is a burden, a real pain. But it looks like in order to survive we've got to be aware of our responsibilities to everyone else."

While Mike and Carol garden, can their own produce, camp, turn down the heat, and recycle whatever they can, they're admittedly low key ecologists.

"I'm not a purist," Mansour says with a smile. "With four kids (Matt, 8; Jack, 5; Paul, 4; and Brooke, 15 months) and two cars I can't be. But we try to do what we can. The kids are more conscious than either of us."

Working on his doctorate in curriculum and administration at MSU, Mansour is on the board of directors of Oakland County Recycling Center and Michigan Environmental Education Association. He is also an energy consultant with the non-profit Bolton Institute, Washington, D.C.

Alumni Fund Soars Past Goal

Again Oakland University alumni have topped their fund raising goal.

At $19,577, 1975 alumni giving substantially exceeded the Association's $18,000 goal.

Last year with a goal of $10,000 alumni overshot to a whopping $16,494.36.

O.U. President Donald D. O'Dowd called the 1975 fund drive totals "fantastic" — especially since Oakland has waged only two "intense" alumni campaigns.

"I think our alumni did a great job. For a relatively young institution — and certainly in terms of our size — the contributions were quite good.

"We're moving!"

Big projects for the 1975 Alumni Fund Drive, chaired by Sally Carter ('67), were a telethon and art auction. Alumni were unable to sponsor the annual Friends of Oakland Swim Meet in 1975.

The 10-day telethon, staffed by 42 grad volunteers, brought in 820 pledges totalling $7,391.

The art auction Oct. 26 raised $758.47.

Engineering Alumni Association members alone, headed by Phil Williams (64), brought in $2,479 — exceeding their $2,000 goal. The 116-member group, in its second year, also made possible $460 in matching gifts.

Of the total fund monies, $7,227 was designated to O.U. departments ranging from the Kresge Library to Matthew Lowry Child Care Center. $9,360.50 was undesignated.

As the '75 campaign ended, there were 1,299 individual contributions compared to 997 in 1974. When received, corporated matching gifts from 14 firms will total $960.

Pioneer Club membership reached 104 — up from last year's 83. Pioneer Club members give $50 or more to the institution during the fund drive year (May 1 through Jan. 31). Many also contribute $100 or more and are named to the university's Century Club.

Alumni Director Elaine Petz applauded volunteers for their efforts and urged others to join in future projects.

"Our volunteers drummed up more than half of what came in," she said. "They really worked."

She also apologized to alums who were solicited more than once, explaining that mailings are done by hand and sometimes duplicate requests slip through.

Members of the Fund Drive Committee were: Chairperson, Sally Ann Carter; Members, Mike and Pat Dobosenski, Julie Fredrick, Ron McPherson, Bill Shea, and Joan Stinson.

Class Chairpersons were: 1963 Julie Fredrick, 1964 Marilyn Francis, 1965 and 1966 Bill Shea, 1967 Pat Dobosenski, 1968 Mike Dobosenski, 1969 John McMullin, 1970 Don de Beauclair, 1971 Julie Fredrick and Larry Baugh, 1972 John Copa, 1973 Ron McPherson.

Matching Gifts received from: American Motors Corporation; Chrysler Corporation Fund; Difco Laboratories; Eaton Corporation; Excello Corporation; Ford Foundation; The Gates Foundation; General Electric Foundation; Hart, Schaffner & Marx Charitable Foundation; Honeywell, Inc.; IBM, Corporation; Occidental Petroleum Corporation; The Upjohn Company; and Westinghouse Educational Foundation.
