'Meninism' is no joke

By Oona Goodin-Smith
Editor-in-Chief

In the spirit of all things April foolery, there's a lot to laugh about this year: waking up to a fresh blanket of snow in April, Nickelback's newest attempt at a revival, and the possibility of ever finding a legal parking spot in P2.

A little humor never hurt anybody - in fact, according to PBS's "This Emotional Life," laughter may actually be the best medicine, proven to have physical, cognitive, emotional and social benefits, ranging from increased creativity and self-esteem to the reduction of physical pain.

In recent years, Internet humor has become the name of the game, with memes, parody accounts and ironic hashtags popping up to give us that on-line pick-me-up.

One hashtag in particular, #MeninistTwitter, arrived on the Internet scene in late 2013 in the name of funny and has stuck in the name of anti-feminism, spawning the informal movement known as "meninism."

Originating as "men sharing jokes - some of which were criticised [sic] as offensive by feminists," according to Benjamin Zand of the BBC, the movement is one meant to "promote equal rights and gender equality," says The Telegraph.

Often defended as

"good-natured," "meninist" tweets today range from asking "Where's men's history month?" as we close out Women's History Month to questioning other physical and social gender double standards to mimicking anti-rape, abortion and domestic violence ads and campaigns from "the man's perspective," according to BuzzFeed News.

The punchline: the gender gap still exists, even for us millennials, and statistically, women lose almost every time. "Meninism" is not a Twitter movement but the society in which we live.

According to a 2014 report in Forbes, "college-educated women working full time were paid an unexplained 7 percent less than their male counterparts were paid one year after graduation."

Male figures dominate leadership positions, boardrooms and media - a study by the Women's Media Center last year found that a whopping 63 percent of bylines in today's journalism (those controlling our news intake) are owned by men.

While we question the lack of men's history month, let's remember that history was predominately written by white males - it's been less than a century since American women even won the right to vote for our country's leader. A majority of our history is taught through the male lens by default. Laughing, yet?

It's 2015, and while there's no denying progress has been made, in the words of James Brown, "it's a man's man's world" and when the reality of any marginalized group is belittled and mocked, we are only moving backward in progression and time.

Is misandry or ignoring male inequity the answer? Absolutely not - the world is cruel to all. In fact, a TODAY Show study examining the male body image found nearly two-thirds of American men to be "dissatisfied with looks" or their body - a growing trend often ignored in male culture.

Instead, we must work to build up and support a group's struggle or concern - not belittle them through near-sighted stabs at humor.

At the 26th GLAAD Media Awards on March 21, Scandal actress Kerry Washington may have said it best:

"We can't say that we believe in each other's fundamental humanity and then turn a blind eye to the reality of each others existence and the truth of each other's hearts. We must be allies...to be represented is to be humanized. And as long as anyone, anywhere is being made to feel less human, our very definition of humanity is at stake and we are all vulnerable."

It's the truth, and that's no joke.

Letter to the Editor: Post headline was offensive

Student 'found the title to be very ignorant and offensive' for last week's Alpha Lambda Delta story

Alexandra Hudas

Health science major, junior

To whom it may concern:
I am currently a full-time student here at Oakland University.

I am writing to you about a recent article I have read in the Oakland Post that was published on March 25, 2014.

This article in question discusses Alpha Lambda Delta, the national collegiate honors society around the country, and how Oakland University's chapter has reached record-breaking membership.

While I applaud Alpha Lambda Delta's achievements and found the article very well-written, I also found the title to be very ignorant and offensive.

Being a Greek-affiliated woman here at OU, I often face deep discrimination around campus and in society in general.

Greek life is often clouded with the stereotype that all people do is party, participate in illegal drugs and do not care about their studies whatsoever.

While some people, Greek and non-Greek, do participate in these risky behaviors and activities, a very large majority affiliated with a Greek association do not. Though you won't see this often in the news, Greek life, especially here at OU, is extremely passionate about philanthropy and helping out the community. Just take a quick look on facebook or on our social media pages, and you can find us participating in food drives, blood drives, and other charitable events- all while sporting our letters proudly with a smile.

In addition, our academics are extremely important to us, and many fraternities and sororities have GPA requirements that their members must follow and maintain in order to participate in events.

I am extremely disappointed that the Oakland Post has chosen a title for an article that perpetuates such a false stereotype.

In addition to my sorority, I am also an active member of the OU Honors college and currently working on my senior thesis proposal to graduate. I am also a member of Alpha Lambda Delta and have a higher than average GPA of 3.7 as a Health Science major with a double minor in Exercise Science and Wellness, Health Promotion and Injury Prevention. I am also involved in the OU Center for Multicultural Initiatives, working as a Peer Mentor.

I place my academics in high regard and try my best in every class I take. I know many of my sisters, as well as members of other Greek organizations, have a similar work ethic and have the same, if not higher, GPAs. With a statement like "Geek not Greek," how can you expect us to ever gain the respect we deserve?

I am also disappointed in Alpha Lambda Delta for making such shirts. As a member of their organization, the slogan makes me feel isolated and banished from my own academic community. I do not understand why an academic community that prides itself on their increase in membership and service would condone such a such a discriminating slogan.

I know many Greek people who are also members of Alpha Lambda Delta, as well as the Honors College, who succeed in and out of the classroom in leadership positions.

However, many people who are uneducated about Greek life will probably never know this because of our stereotype in popular media. We deserve respect for our achievements just like our non-Greek peers.

I hope you take this into consideration when writing your next article. This in no way hinders my love of reading the Oakland Post, nor does it hinder my respect for Alpha Lambda Delta.

However, I feel like this is an issue that continues to be downplayed time and time again. I can only hope that one day people will actually take into account the positive service and academic success that Greeks are achieving around the world- not just the negative.

Madonna's opinion of hometown may be spot on Growing up in upper class suburbia isn't as peachy as it seems

Recently, pop music star Madonna travelled across the country speaking to national media about her upcoming tour and release of her new studio album, Rebel Heart.

Garrett Kolodziej
Communication major, senior

Madonna paid a visit to radio icon Howard Stern's talk program, discussing everything from David Letterman to donuts and even past lovers.

She was also asked to speak on her thoughts about her hometown of Rochester, MI.

While this wasn't the most important question, it became the most controversial portion of the interview causing a social media uproar locally.

People don't seem to think that Madonna has any right to ridicule the place she grew up.

Contrary to popular belief, the pop star exposes a very fatal flaw about the city and region we live in.

Although she attended school at Rochester Adams High, her family lived in Pontiac.

Madonna spent much of her childhood as a free spirit with parents who encouraged her to not be bound by conventional beliefs.

Much of the area that surrounds Pontiac can be characterized as upscale, wealthy white-collar families.

It's also guided by a conservative mind frame suggesting safe neighborhoods and discourages suspicious and urban influences on children.

As a child, I can't fathom the idea of having to channel my beliefs and lifestyle at a school and an area that simply disregards this behavior as reckless and outlandish.

Yet, the entire city of Rochester and Metro Detroit is turning their back simply because she doesn't want to be guided by this false sense of reality.

I do believe that she saw "biased and provincial" thinking when she was a

"It's okay to be critical of outsiders, but to completely disregard one opinion because you don't love the city or understand the person doesn't mean you're wrong."

Garrett Kolodziej
Communication major, senior child.

She chose not to partake in a frame of mind that has left Rochester/Detroit and the surrounding region the butting joke of America.

Thinking like this has only left Michigan with a slew of political, social and racial problems.

It's okay to be critical of outsiders, but to completely disregard one opinion because you don't love the city or understand the person doesn't mean you're wrong.

It just means the people of Rochester are too naïve to think that all white kids with no harsh upbringing in an upper class environment don't want to be cosmopolitan.

We're all different, and with a culturally diverse region like Metro Detroit, there should be some applauding her.

Not many kids get the opportunity to live a privileged life.

There are many of those kids, like myself, however, that don't care to have material things.

The residents of Rochester want you to think otherwise.

It certainly doesn't help when you have a Mayor publicly bashing someone and feeding into the stereotypes commonly associated with outlying suburban towns like Rochester.

It will take some time for Rochester residents to learn how to think for themselves and not the group.

The digital generation we live in gives us an instant voice, and one that is clearly rescinding any support for the pop star locally.

She will most certainly lose fan support, but I don't think she cares. And neither should you, the audience.

Madonna stirred the pot locally with these comments.

Now it's time for everyone to start eradicating this problem of groupthink and become a better community for all.

POLICE FILES

Vandenberg employee reports assault and battery

An OUPD officers responded to call reporting an assault on a housing employee in West Vandenberg at about 3:45 a.m. on March 26.

The employee said she had encountered a drunk student rummaging through a trash can in a trash room. She requested his ID and he gave it to her. When she did not give it back, the student became aggressive, grabbing her shoulders and grabbing at her hand for the ID. He shortly gave up and left his ID and the building.

The employee does not want to prosecute the student, but stated that she felt uncomfortable with him being in the same building as her.

Marijuana found in Hamlin Hall

On March 27 around 7 p.m., OUPD officers were dispatched to Hamlin Hall to investigate a complaint of marijuana odor.

After knocking on the door they believed the smell was coming from, the officers were greeted by a student with bloodshot and red, watery eyes. The student and his friend both admitted to having been smoking marijuana. The officers asked if there was any in the room and they replied that there was. In the room, the officers discovered the leftovers of two hand-rolled joints, a marijuana grinder and more marijuana in a duffle bag.

Citations were issued to both students for marijuana use. All evidence was collected by the officers.

Students caught tampering with fire suppression system

A fire systems inspector informed the OUPD that someone had been tampering with the fire suppression system in the Engineering Center March 24.

After viewing surveillance video, OUPD officers located and confronted the suspects. They admitted what they had done but stated that they had no idea the know they had turned was a part of the fire suppression system.

Since there was no damage and no intent to sabotage the system, the students were not criminally charged.

Multiple police departments responded to a "be on the lookout" (BOL) message on Wednesday, March 25.

False alarm wakes up campus

OUPD responds to call for backup from Auburn Hills police

Kaylee Kean
Staff Reporter

Two people were pulled over on campus Wednesday, March 25 in an investigation on an armed robbery in Pontiac. They were not the suspects.

Around 9:41 a.m. a tan minivan was pulled over outside of Wilson Hall, according to Oakland University Chief of Police Mark Gordon.

Police cars from OU, Oakland County and Auburn Hills departments surrounded the scene as officers handcuffed the male driver of the van.

According to witnesses he was detained for over 15 minutes until police figured out he was not the suspect.

Earlier in the morning an armed robbery had occurred on Perry Street in Pontiac, according to Gordon. The Oakland County Sheriff's Department was investigating and sent out a "be on the lookout" (BOL) alert to other area departments.

The BOL said to watch out for a tan minivan and male driver.

Auburn Hills police saw the van and followed it to campus, according to Gordon, contacting OUPD for backup and pulling the van over outside on Wilson Blvd.

"The driver matched the description, the vehicle matched the description on the armed robbery," Gordon said.

More cars began to arrive: four from the Auburn Hills department, two from the Oakland County Sheriff's department and two from the OUPD.

"They had him get on his knees and they handcuffed him and put him in a car," said Latasha Curry, accounting clerk in Student Business Services.

She said she was walking to her office in Wilson when she noticed the lights and cars.

"Initially it looked like it was a traffic stop," Curry said. "There was no speeding or anything, no sirens."

But soon officers were using their cruiser doors as shields and had guns drawn as the driver got out of the car. He put his hands up and slowly walked away from the van, according to Curry.

The passenger of the van, a young female, was also asked out of the vehicle and pulled over to speak with officers.

After speaking with the woman, police took the handcuffed man out of the police car and brought him into the entrance of Wilson, where they spoke for "quite a while."

Precautionary measures

It could have been a potentially dangerous situation, Gordon said, so the highest measures of precaution were taken.

Once officers realized the man was not the suspect, they released him, apologized and thanked them for their cooperation.

"That was it," Gordon said. "It was unfortunate that this happened, it was the wrong person, and as soon as they knew that they had the wrong person they let him go."

Curry said it was a scary and surreal thing to watch.

"You know what's crazy?" she said. "I left because I mentor in high school in Pontiac and I was coming down Perry and that street shut off because they had maybe three cars blocking off."

"You know that (OUPD) is associated with the Auburn Hills Police Department, but you just don't think of anything serious happening on campus."

None of the departments identified the people who were pulled over.

Culvert report: rebuilding the deteriorating pipe

Construction on new culvert and bridge to begin this summer

Shelby Tankersley
Staff Reporter

Over the last 50 years, a culvert, or pipe, has been slowly deteriorating underneath Meadow Brook Rd. OU plans to do some construction to fix it over the summer.

They were tossing around the idea of just building a bridge across the road, but they decided on building a new culvert to replace the one that is already there. The section that will be under construction is on the hill that leads to the apartments.

"The bridge would be completed by September 2016. The culvert will be completed by October 2015," John Beaghan, vice president for Finance and Administration, said.

In August 2014, the OU made repairs to the culvert, but it appears that the emergency supports won't hold out for another year, so they had to make this decision rather quickly. They also had to take into account what would be best for the students.

Since the bridge won't be completed until September 2016, it will block off a heavily trafficked area of OU's roads. It would particularly inconvenience those who live in the apartments.

On top of that, building a new culvert is significantly cheaper than a bridge.

"The bridge cost would be approximately $5.1 million. The culvert cost is approximately $2.9 million," Beaghan said. "At this cost differential, there is no advantage to building a bridge, which is why the board approved the culvert proposal."

Unfortunately, since the culvert isn't planned to be finished until October, that portion of Meadow Brook Rd. will be closed when students come back to school. For residents who do a lot of driving, this might not be the welcome back they are hoping for.

"I leave campus four or five times a week," sophomore Erin Worman said.

For students who leave campus often for either work or recreational reasons, the new construction may leave them leaving later than they hoped.

"It would make things inconvenient, but I leave during times when it isn't a high traffic area," Worman said. "When classes get out, it will probably make it difficult to leave campus when so many other people are leaving at the same time."

Though it might make driving at the beginning of the school year a hassle, the new construction will ensure that Meadow Brook Rd. remains a safe place to drive. After all, the emergency supports won't hold out forever.

Erika Barker / The Oakland Post

Construction crews working on the new bridge and culvert project should be finished by the start of the fall 2016 semester.
